CROSS OVER

It never dawned on me that research could be a form of crossing over. A passage from State A to State B. If that is so, then one must be willing to carry himself/herself from a place to another. The same may be said of our faculty members as they cross over from being plain classroom mentors to being researchers, leaving the comforts of their familiar walls to enter into a new world: that of research and its many possibilities—public presentation and publication included.

That exactly is the new thrust of our Journal of Institutional Research and Development (JIRD). Cruzar! Spanish word for cross-over, crossing over. The new name of JIRD.

I congratulate the Research Department (RD) for bringing the research works of our faculty members together in one publication: a clear product of crossing over, of getting out of the usual mold to discover something new.

May research be a continual act of crossing over for our faculty members, and eventually non-teaching personnel (Subir is a new journal publication meant for them).

Once in a while, when things get too technical, boring, and dull, I am suddenly inspired by the thought that this, too, shall pass, like a phase, like one brave act to let oneself be carried away by a stream of current so strong, one could not help but cross over. The act of doing research is like that. It is always a way of moving, gracefully, from one point to another. Like crossing over.

Sometimes unnoticed. Oftentimes real.
